

3) His feet became tangled up in the creepers and he is suspended upside down, like an enormous fruit.

I think this means he is stuck or trapped in samsara (life and death).

4) Looking down, he sees that a powerful snake is waiting at the bottom of the well. Looking upward he sees that a great elephant is slowly circling the edge of the well – an elephant with six blackened mouths and twelve feet.

The powerful snake represents death and the angel elephant is telling him his life is over and the twelve legs represent 12 months.

5) As he looks, he notices some fearsome bees coming from a tree overhanging the well. In the midst of the tree, he sees a stream of honey flowing down towards him. He reaches out to drink it, his thirst for its sweetness overwhelming his fears. With each mouthful he is left unsatisfied and needs more.

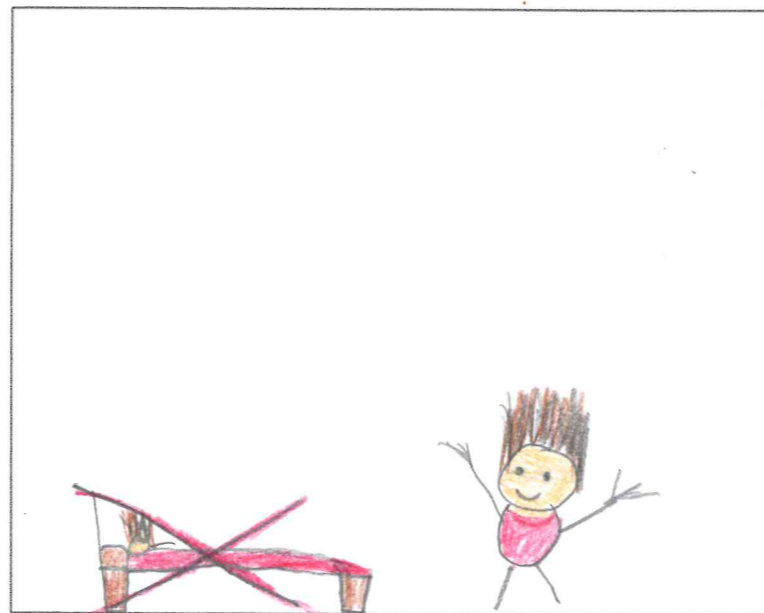

I think the bees represent all the fun things in life. He can not get enough of them.

6) Out of the corner of his eye, he notices some black and white mice nibbling on the creepers...

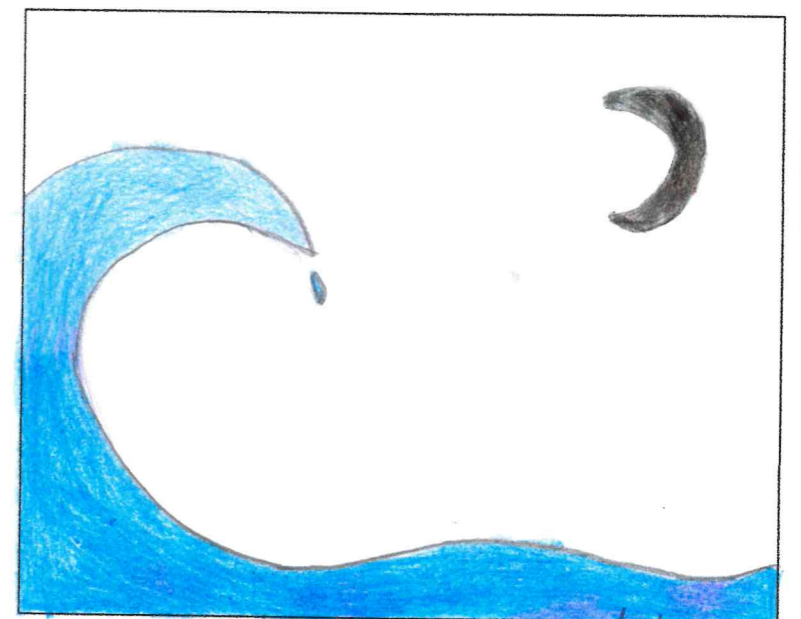

This is good karma because he could come off because they are nibbling on the vines.

7) Despite the great and terrible dangers he is in, the man does not get tired of living or give up hope of life

He will never stop until he gets his moksha.

8) And there he stays, thrown into the ocean of existence.

I think he got reincarnated. He is still in samsara, and hasn't achieved Moksha.
